Awake From Atrophy: Rethinking the Church (Not the Bible) and Finishing the Reformation (A Fable of the Member-Driven Church) Scott Wozniak

Church wasn't always done the way we do it today. Worship didn't always mean three to four songs at the beginning of the service. Sermons weren't always twenty-five to forty-five minutes long. And giving didn't always include collecting 10% of the members' income into a single account. Take a fresh look at the church and discover how authentic community, intimate worship, and radical obedience can be a part of your weekend gatherings in a whole new way-without abandoning the timeless truth of the Bible. In this easy to read fable, Drew and Jessica Walker face a crisis that will lead them to epiphany when they encounter a member-driven church for the first time. Drew Walker is a bible-believing associate pastor, wrestling with questions about the rapidly growing, successful church he works for. One too many radical sermons lands him in a career crisis, only to discover his wife has a surprise announcement all her own. In a desperate race against the clock, Drew scrambles to find a new position at a church that is biblically grounded and tangibly serving its community. Visits to a few interested churches only raise more questions. Meanwhile, Drew's mentor from seminary makes a request that thrusts him into a much bigger quandary than he could have anticipated, launching him into rethinking not just his pastoral career, but the last fifteen centuries of church history.
