Not illustrated. 1801 Excerpt: ... tile themselves very little about religion, and they have neither the ceremonies, nor the fanaticism of sedentary nations. As for their manners, to describe them accurately, it would be necessary to have lived among them- They have, however, the reputation of not being robbers, like the Arabs, though they are neither less generous, nor less hospitable than they; and when: we consider that they live in plenty, without being rich, and are inured to war, and hardened by fatigue and danger, we may presume they are equally removed from the corruption of towns and the abasement of the country. Sext. II. Of the Curds. The Curds are another body of the nation whose divided tribes are equally dispersed over Lower Asia, and have extended themselves very widely, especially within the last hundred years. Their original country is the chain of mountains from whence issue the different branches of the Tigris, which surrounding the upper part of the great Zab, passes to the southward, as far as the frontiers of the Irak-adjami, or Persian Irak. In modern geography, it is known by the name of Curd-cjlan. It is very fertile in grains lint, sesame, and rice; it abounds in excellent pasturage, and produces galls and even silk. There are also sweet acorns gathered about two or three inches long, of which they make a species of bread. This country is mentioned in the most ancient traditions and histories of the east, in which it is made the scene of several mythological events. The Chaldean Berofus, and the Armenian Maribas, cited by Moses Chorenensis, assert that it was in the mountains Gord-onæi that Xisothrus landed after escaping from the deluge...
